The Nature of, and Changes in,
Different Forms of Political Participation, including Voting Behaviour

Political Participation:
Nature and Changes

Participation

Leach and Scoones (2002)

People may be allowed some choice over whether or not to exercise such rights or participate in the political process.

Example: Voting in the UK, for example, is not compulsory (unlike in countries such as Australia or Belgium).

Choice

Under this model everyone is entitled to certain rights, safeguarded by the State, such as legal equality, the right to own property, to vote and so forth. These rights are automatically given, although there may be some restrictions (in terms of age, for example).

Universal

Focus on the idea of individuals "who act rationally to advance their own interests, while the State's role is to protect and enforce their rights".

Liberal

Models

Inclusion

Adopted by Labour in the 21st century, with their ideas about social inclusion and exclusion reflected in attempts to create or develop local self-help communities and initiatives. On a broader scale, communitarian models are characteristic of some forms of New Social Movement.

Social Capital

Putnam: "Social networks of trust and reciprocity" (people, in other words, are willing and able to help each other). Cohen and Prusak (2001): The "social glue" that binds people in (political) networks of mutual help and co-operation.

Embedded

This participatory model focuses on the concept of a socially embedded citizen, whereby the "good of the community" has priority over the interests of the individual. The focus here is on the ways people form and sustain local communities (neighbourhoods, for example) through their general participation in the political life of that community.

Communitarian

Example: Etzioni (1993) and Putnam (2001) - in particular the latter's concept of "Bowling Alone".

Synoptic Link
Crime and Deviance

One example of this idea is the development of Community Security Officers to patrol local areas and neighbourhoods.

Civic

This model represents political participation in terms of the development of specific groups that, in turn, attempt to participate in - and influence - wider political processes.

Identity

Politics

Sectional

Model reflects idea of sectional interests - groups who develop around a common theme or purpose and try to influence the decisions made by those in power. This model can be applied to a wide range of groups - from citizens banding together to oppose the development of a new road neighbourhood to the general behaviour of pressure groups.

Although similar to the civic model, the focus is on identity politics - the idea that certain types of group (women, ethnic groups and the like) develop group identities based around a common theme (such as feminist politics or religious beliefs). For this type, the distinction between personal and public political participation is generally blurred - the personal experiences and beliefs of individual members are directly transferred into public political actions.

Example: The development, especially in American politics, of New Right ("Born-Again") Christian groups who attempt to impose their personal religious beliefs into the general political sphere (in terms of, for example, an anti-abortion position).

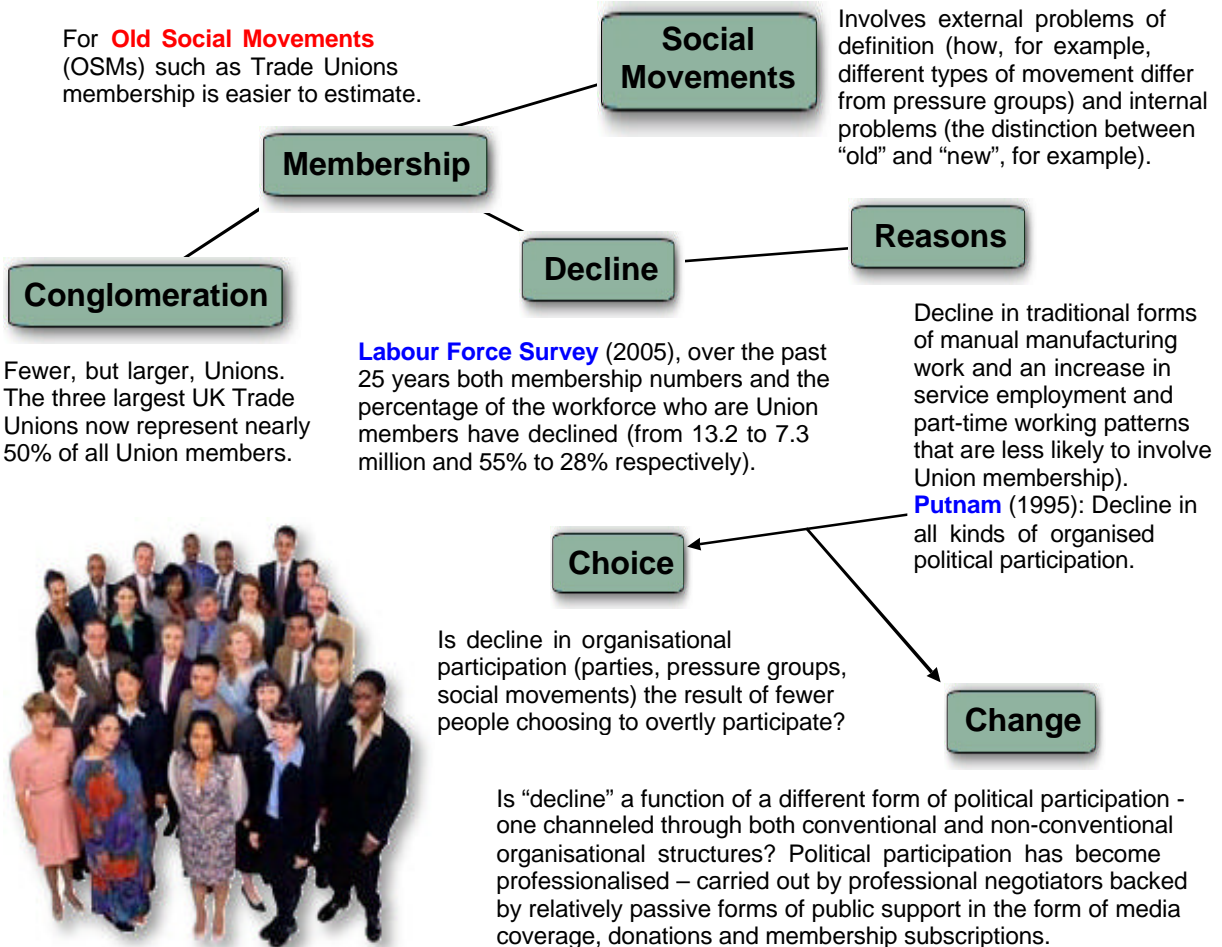

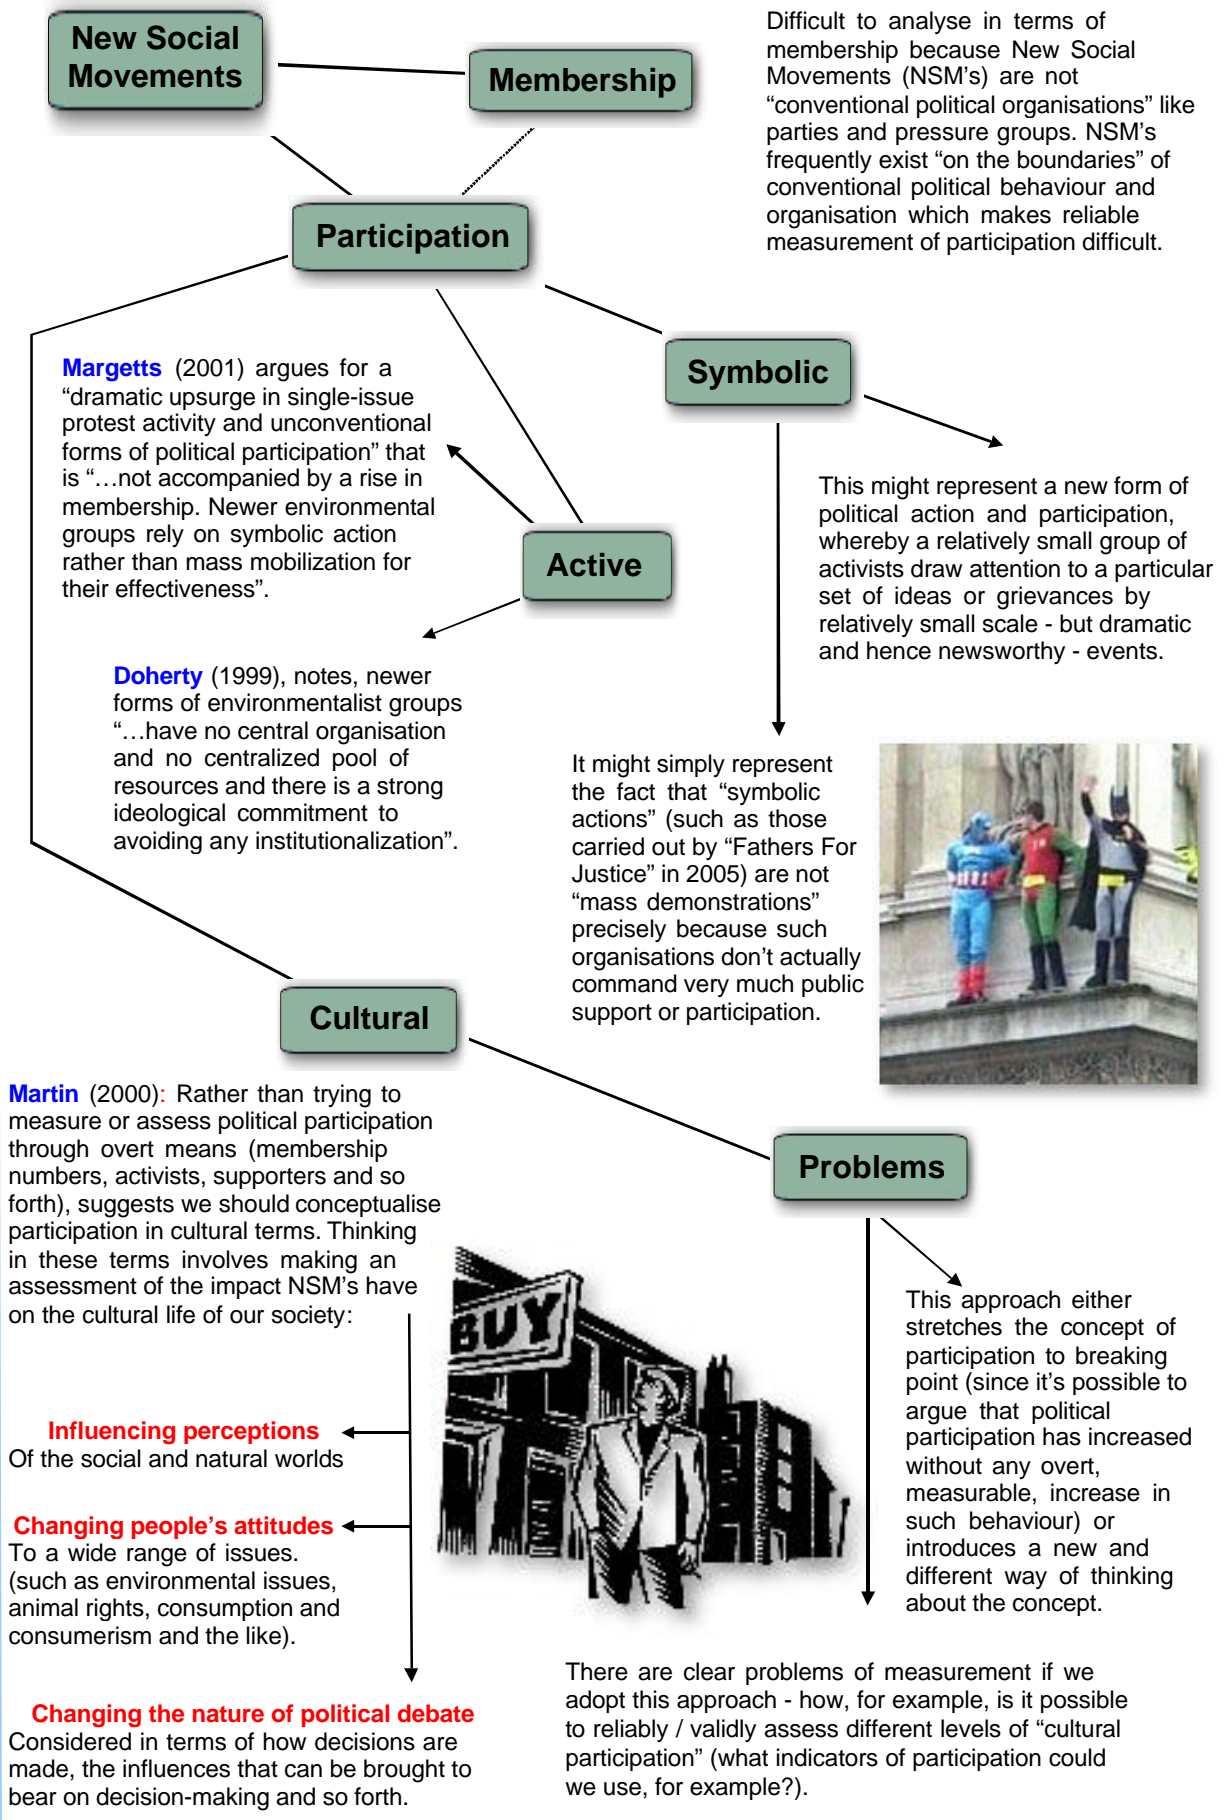

Most pressure group participation is relatively passive and "membership" and "support" are frequently the same thing - by gathering support through (a relatively passive) membership pressure groups enhance their ability to influence governments and political parties (they represent substantial number of people)

Jordan and Halpin: The majority of members rarely play a direct participatory role.

"The best way to support Friends of the Earth is through a regular gift because it provides the dependable income we need to mount long-term campaigns to protect our environment".

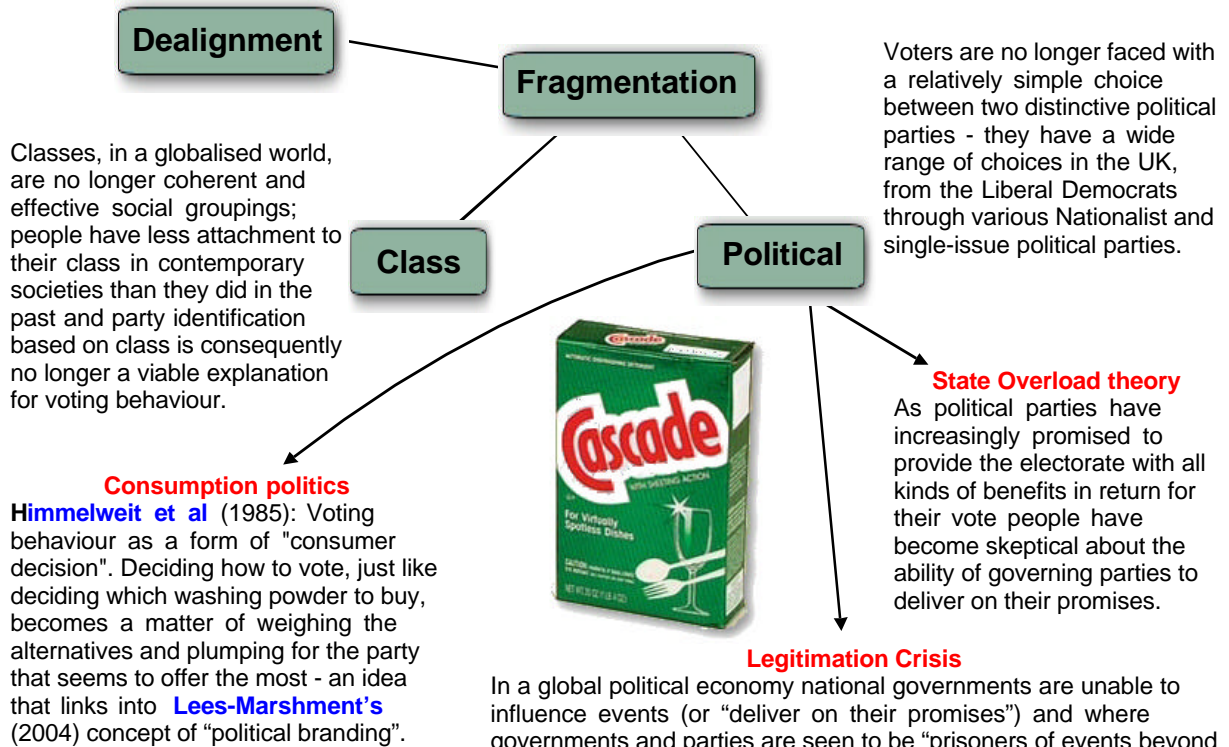

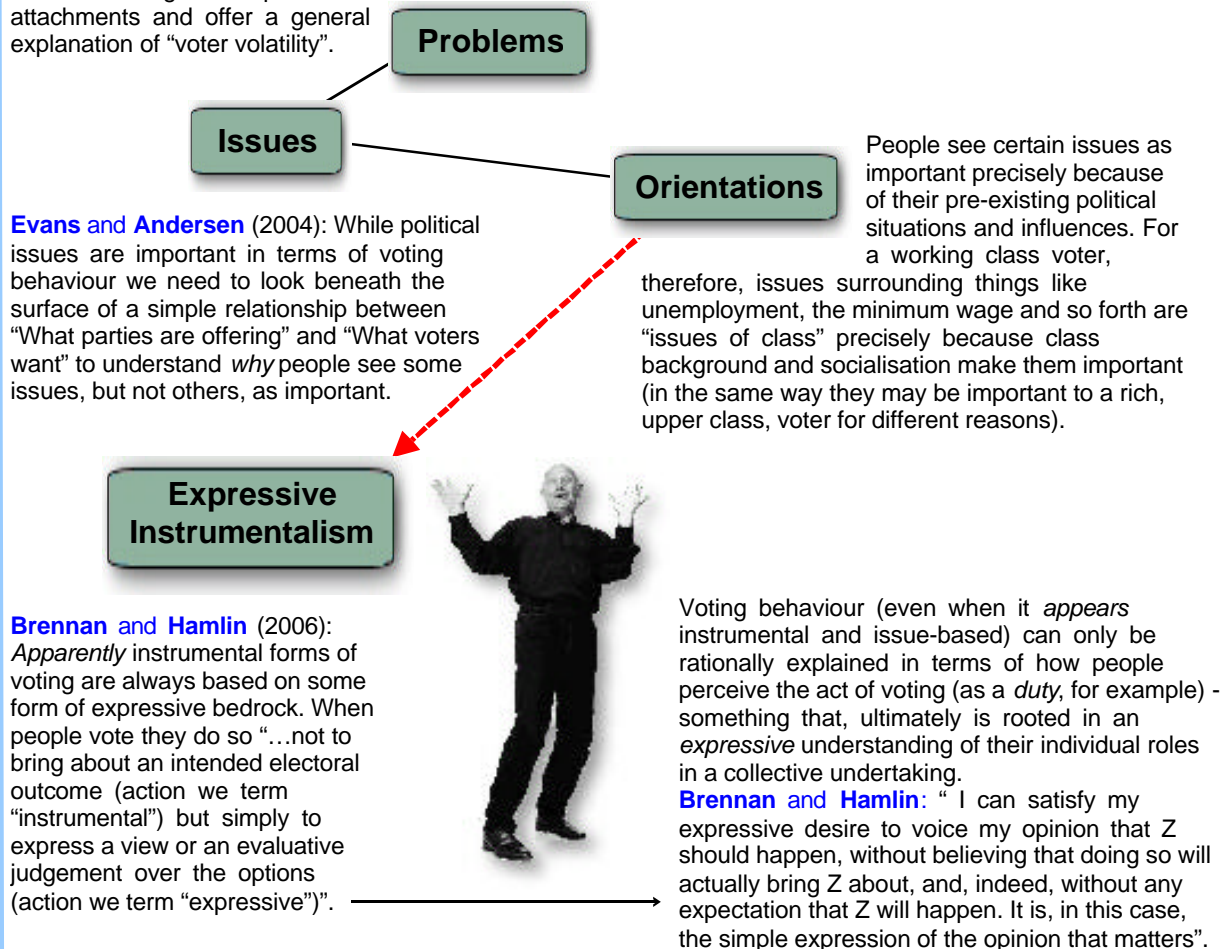

Partisan dealignment models are attractive in that they both question the idea of a simple relationship between voting and expressive attachments and offer a general explanation of "voter volatility".

Exam Questions

Item A

The old pull of party allegiance, the loyal support for your party through thick and thin, is fading away. Nowadays there is a shop-around vote. Voters might go first one way today and another tomorrow. There is a great deal of switching party allegiance, with none of that sense of the guilt people used to feel when defecting from one party to another. Also, in ever-increasing numbers, voters are exercising their rights not to bother with voting at all. Turnout is becoming as important an electoral indicator now as the share of the vote which each party achieves. That was evident in the 1997 election, when non-voters outnumbered the second-placed Tories. That is why the government has tried out a number of different ways to encourage more people to vote.

8 marks

Identify and briefly explain two of the ways used by the government to encourage more people to vote in recent elections (Item A).

8 marks

Identify and briefly explain two measures taken by governments and / or political parties to get young people more involved in politics today.

12 marks

Examine the view that political participation among the population as a whole is declining.

12 marks

Briefly examine some of the sociological evidence for the changing nature of party allegiance in voting behaviour since 1979.

40 marks

“The British public have become increasingly disenchanted with participation in politics.”

Assess the extent to which sociological arguments and evidence support this view.

40 marks

Critically examine the view that voting behaviour is no longer class-based, but is determined by a complex mix of economic, cultural and ethnic factors.
